TIME FOR A SMILE

At last Fred got an apprenticeship. His future master explained to him: “At the beginning you’ll get 200; in half a year 350.” “That’s nice,” said Fred, “I’ll come back in half a year then.”

“Is there a file compression program that will help me to squeeze 12 hours of work into an 8 hour schedule?”

BUSINESS CULTURE TIPS

- The CEO of a company is the Chief Executive Officer. This is the administrator who makes the most important decisions in an organization or business. CEO runs the business with the help of officers of lower rank.

- Though the majority of leadership and/or executive positions in European and American businesses are still held by men, it's becoming more common to meet women in management positions. While conducting business with an US or EU company, expect to interact with women who hold powerful positions.
- We often say “Now that we're all here” to get the attention of a group and to signal that a meeting or presentation is about to begin. This phrase can also call attention to the fact that someone has arrived late, causing a delay in the meeting.
- The person who requested the meeting will usually come to the meeting with an agenda, which will be shared with everyone present. This person will run, or lead, the meeting, beginning by introducing everyone present if people don't already know each other. If the meeting is by speakerphone, the people physically present will introduce himself or herself for the benefit of the person on the phone.
- The phrase “let me” is used in a variety of ways. You can use the phrase to introduce his next statement. To be polite, the other people at the meeting should now focus their attention on your words. You can use “let me” as an introduction with many similar verbs. For example, you may say: “Let me tell you about...” or “Let me explain why...”
- Americans sometimes say, “Let me see...” when they are looking for information or trying to remember something. The phrase indicates that the speaker is going to respond, but that he may need a moment to think or look for something.
- When we say that someone “makes good” on something, we're focusing on the achievement of success. For example, you are referring to the fact that somebody has built a successful and profitable business.

- “Would you mind?” is a useful courtesy phrase. Use it to soften a request. It’s often shortened by dropping the words “would you” as in “Mind if I take a look at that?”.
- “Hell, no!” is an expression of strong disagreement. It is mildly vulgar, and can be offensive to some people.
- “If there’s nothing else” is a standard phrase that’s used to give the participants in a meeting a chance to mention any final points they want to bring up before the meeting is ended.
- When you say, “I’m afraid” you don’t mean that you are fearful. Rather, you’re expressing an apology for what you’re about to say. This is a polite way to disagree with or to disappoint somebody.
